Many and various were the gems they wore, both men and women, crystal, agate, onyx, chalcedony, cornelian, lasper, amethyst. Scissors seem to have been unknown; no wonder, then, that men preferred to wear their hair long. The excavations however, have furnished us with several specimens of ancient razors. They are made of bronze, and trials made in modern times have shown that these instruments take on a good edge. Accordingly it is not surprising to find that the old Mykenacans used to thave. However, the monuments show that only in the second period of their greatness was the practice of shaving general, and even then they usually shaved only the mustache, allowing the beard to grow down long into a point.
